The partnership was establish ed some six or seven years ago, and the firm enjoyed an excellent reputation and transacted a profitable business. The co-partnership contract was not limited and was terminable at the will of either party. About three weeks ago, Barker contemplating an extended European trip, proposed to Iselin a disso-lution of business and a mutual winding up of accounts. Iselin displayed surprise at the proposal, and endeavored earnestly to dissuade Barker from his purpose, but the latter persisted, and Iselin seemed somewhat disconcerted. Barker insisted on liquidation, and that an accountant should be call in to examine the books and render a fin account.
